Development of immunogenicity in maternal and neonatal goats after vaccination of pregnant goats with a new low-dose, single-antigen, homologous-strain adenovirus vaccine against caprine arthritis-encephalitis. Development of immunity in animals and humans after vaccination is under multifaceted and complex control mechanisms. Maternal antibodies to viral antigens at birth can have direct and indirect effects on the immune development of the offspring. In this work, the effectiveness of a single-antigen, low-dose, live, homologous-strain bovine adenovirus (BAdV) vaccine as an immune modulator for reducing the risk of caprine arthritis-encephalitis virus (CAEV) infection in offspring was investigated. Pregnant goats were immunized at 14-21 days of gestation with a single intramuscular (IM) dose of a low-dose, live, homologous BAdV-4 vaccine, then at the time of parturition and 1 and 3 days postpartum goats were challenged with virulent CAEV by oral administration. Blood samples were collected to assess postvaccination immunity and CAEV challenge. The goats were euthanized for blood collection when goats became sick or died from CAEV infection.
